CITY GAL

It was a hot, steamy day and when Hickory had finished feeding the hogs and milking the cows and going through the rest of his twice-daily round of chores, he decided on a swim. Paw was off to town to buy a stock of seed and there was no pressing work to be done. That was one reason Hickory liked the mountain country. A feller didn't have to run himself ragged all the time, finding more work to do. When an important job was done he could relax and go swimming or fishing or hunting or just plain laze in the shade.

"Swimmin' hole," Hickory said happily, "here I come."

He trotted down through the east meadow, ducked under the barb-wire fence and followed an obscure path that brought him to the center of the thicket lining one side of the swimming hole. Whistling gaily, he slid the overall straps off his shoulders and bent to kick off his heavy shoes.

From a spot behind and below him an indignant female voice said suddenly, "Well, of all things. Just what do you think you're doing, young man?"

Hickory whirled, red-faced, snatching up the slipping overalls. He goggled at the large, angry feminine face that peered up at him from the surface of the swimming hole. Beyond the stream now, he saw what he had overlooked before, the nose of a shiny car poked in under the trees.

"Oh, my golly, ma'am," Hickory gulped. "I didn't know you were here. Honest, I didn't."

"Well," the woman said, "I suppose you mountaineers aren't used to having civilization come this close to your borders. It so happens I became very warm driving through the mountains, so when I saw this inviting little stream, I parked and went for a cooling dip. Stop blushing, young man. No harm has been done."

"Yes'm," Hickory said. "I mean, no'm." He backed a couple of steps. "You go right on with your—er—coolin' dip, ma'am. I'll hike back to the house and I won't bother you none."

"That's all right," the woman said. She scowled thoughtfully. "Stay here and talk to me. I'm quite interested in the quaint habits and customs of you backwoods people. Stay and tell me about yourself."

At the words, she straightened up, having been squatted all this time in water that was barely waist deep, and started to clamber up to the bank. Hickory took one horrified look, squawked like a frog in a snake's mouth and turned a brilliant crimson. He covered his eyes.

"M-ma'am," he gulped frantically. "G-get back under the water quick so's I can uncover my eyes enough to see my way out."

The big woman's laughter boomed out. "You silly person," she guffawed. "I never saw anything so ridiculous. I'm perfectly well clothed for bathing. This is a French bathing suit. Didn't you ever hear of them?"

"No, ma'am," Hickory said firmly, his eyes still covered. "That ain't what we call it around here. We call it our Birthday Suit."

"Oh, don't be stupid," the woman snapped. She came splashing up onto the bank. "This is a perfectly legal, normal bathing suit. Stop acting like a child."

"All right," Hickory said and uncovered his eyes. There was, he had to admit, a certain amount of bathing suit visible, but in the mountain country an ankle-length number was more common. "Ma'am, that suit just ain't suitable for this country."

"Nonsense," the Amazon barked. "I'm tired of stuffy, stupid primitives who haven't caught up with civilization. And just to show you how I feel, I'm going to march right up that path until I meet more of you people."

"No," Hickory bleated wildly. "You mustn't! Don't!"

But the woman was already striding firmly away. She got perhaps twenty feet before the first scream ripped out of her anguished throat. She jumped and screamed again. She was still screaming when Hickory tore through the bushes and wrapped his shirt around her legs.

"I tried to tell you, ma'am," he gasped. "It ain't modesty that makes us go fer long swimmin' suits here. It's them goldarn stinging nettles all over the path."
